Who Was Margaret Sanger?

Margaret Sanger (1879–1966) was an American birth control activist, educator, writer, and nurse. Her relentless advocacy for women's reproductive rights and her efforts to make contraception accessible revolutionized women's health and rights in the United States and globally.

Founding of Organizations

- Established the first birth control clinic in the U.S. in 1916. - Founded the American Birth Control League in 1921, which later became Planned Parenthood Federation of America. - Worked tirelessly to promote contraception and reproductive education.

Core Ideas and Beliefs

Reproductive Rights and Family Planning

- Promoted the use of contraceptives to reduce unwanted pregnancies. - Emphasized education for women to make informed choices. - Believed birth control was a tool for social and economic improvement.

Eugenics and the Concept of the "New Race"

It is vital to acknowledge that Sanger's work was intertwined with eugenic ideas, which sought to improve the human race through selective breeding. While her focus was on empowering women, she also held beliefs about race and heredity that have been widely scrutinized. The "New Race" Concept - Sanger envisioned a "new race" of healthier, more capable humans. - Her conception of the "new race" was tied to reducing the birthrate of those deemed "unfit" and encouraging reproduction among the "fit." - This idea was influenced by progressive eugenics, which aimed to improve societal health through selective reproductive practices.

Margaret Sanger and the Eugenics Movement

While her advocacy for birth control aimed to reduce suffering and improve societal health, her association with eugenics complicates her legacy.

Alignment with Eugenic Thought
